Don't know why they asked me to ask, other that it's a late request. I just told them I would find out if you are in town and they can make the formal request.

PRESIDENT OBAMA TO ATTEND CBCF PHOENIX AWARDS DINNER Four to Receive Prestigious Awards Recognizing Contributions to America

WASHINGTON - The Congressional Black Caucus Foundation (CBCF) today announced President Barack Obama is scheduled to attend the Annual Phoenix Awards Dinner Saturday, September 24. The dinner concludes the Foundation's 41st Annual Legislative Conference (ALC). President Obama is scheduled to address more than 3,000 expected attendees at the evening's event.

Four distinguished individuals will receive the prestigious Phoenix Awards, Environmental Protection Agency Administrator Lisa P. Jackson; U.S. Representative and civil rights activist John Lewis; athlete and humanitarian George Edward Forman, Sr; and civil rights leader Rev. Dr. Joseph E. Lowery. President Obama himself was the recipient of the Phoenix Award in 2008, which recognizes individuals for their efforts and accomplishments that have made significant contributions to society, and symbolizes the immortality of the human spirit and an eternal desire to reach its full potential.

In addition, the six surviving founders of the Congressional Black Caucus (CBC) will be honored during the evening, in recognition of the 40th anniversary of CBC. Actor and activist Hill Harper and WJLA veteran evening news anchor Maureen Bunyan will serve as co-emcees.

ALC provides an outlet to highlight the mission of CBCF - to develop leaders, to inform policy and to educate the public - by providing more than 80-high level, thought-provoking forums to address the critical challenges facing the African-American Diaspora. This year, thousands are expected to reflect on the conference's theme: iLead|iServe. ALC attendees will have many opportunities to share their thoughts and experiences on leadership and service - how and why they do it, the value of each, and the impact of each within their lives and their communities. The conference will use social media, a town hall meeting, brain trusts and personal interaction to further encourage discussions and follow-up conversations among attendees.

By Darryl Fears, Tuesday, May, 6:52 PM

A historic black church that has sat on the same corner in LeDroit Park for 99 years has become the first African American church in the District to rely on renewable solar energy for electrical power.

Florida Avenue Baptist's http://www.flavbc.org/ installation of 44 solar panels was hailed at a ribbon-cutting Tuesday by Environmental Protection Agency Administrator Lisa P. Jackson and other government officials as a breakthrough in the black community, where the clean-energy divide mirrors its well-known high-tech digital divide with the white community.

"This is an important first," said Jackson, whose agency recently started a faith-based initiative to increase clean-energy awareness among religious groups. "They're saying: We're going to take the lead in helping African American homes to become energy efficient."

The church's pastor, the Rev. Earl D. Trent Jr., said the panels' installation, by a North Carolina-based company in March, was important not only because the church will save money on its $3,000 monthly electric bill from Pepco but also because it will reduce "dirty" coal-fired energy and enable him to establish a "green ministry" that could awaken churchgoers who know little to nothing about clean energy and its benefits.

African Americans tend to live in older, less energy-efficient homes equipped with older appliances and, therefore, have higher energy bills.

According to "Energy Democracy <

http://www.centerforsocialinclusion.org/publications/wp-content/plugins/publications/uploads/Energy Democracy Report (WEB).pdf>," a 2010 report by the Center for Social Inclusion, African Americans spent an average of $1,439 on electric bills in 2008, more than what Latino and Asian Americans spent, and significantly higher than what white Americans paid.

"We want to be a model for green energy," Trent said in an earlier interview. "I've gotten calls from pastors who want to find out how they can do this," he added, raising his hope that the renewable-energy divide can be bridged.

African American churches have historically led social change in black communities, raising awareness of civil rights in the past and now, possibly, environmental justice, Trent said. Helping to lower coal-energy production, even marginally, at power plants is a symbolic step in a nation where, he said, many black people live near such plants and their smokestacks.

"African Americans have more sources of pollution in their neighborhoods than others," Jackson said, standing on the roof of the church near Howard University Hospital as the sun beat down. "We have mercury, neurotoxins building up in our bodies . . . mothers pass it to children. We have . . . developmental disorders. All that comes back to this," she said, pointing to the row of solar panels.

"I think it's an extraordinary thing," said Vernice Miller-Travis, vice chair of the Maryland Commission on Environmental Justice and Sustainable Communities. "For me, this is a big story, even if it's just one church. You know how black churches are. If one pastor does it, the others have to do it because they don't want to be outdone."

When ministers inquire about getting panels, they'll learn that they'll have to spend green to go green.

At Florida Avenue Baptist, which has 500 members, the cost was $60,000. With prayer, and 12 members of the flock who were willing to invest money in exchange for Solar Renewable Energy Certificates < http://www.epa.gov/greenpower/documents/gpp basics-recs.pdf>, the cost was overcome.

The certificates are a kind of energy credit that companies such as power plants buy to sidestep government regulations and penalties for producing too much pollution.

The idea to go solar came to Trent through Gilbert Campbell III, a co-owner of Volt Energy < http://volt-energy.com/, a North Carolina clean-energy company with an office in Washington. Campbell, a Howard University graduate who met Trent years earlier through his father, a pastor, had a proposition.

"I want to share with you the benefits of the church looking at solar," Campbell recalled saying in December. "You have an opportunity to educate younger students in the church," he said. "There's a value associated with that."

Volt Energy helped Florida Avenue Baptist set up a business, allowing it to make the investment and receive the certificates. The investors recouped $18,000 within 60 days from a federal tax credit that for-profit entities receive for making investments in renewable technology.

Volt Energy also customized a curriculum for the church, teaching energy efficiency, recycling, and the how-tos of using energy-efficient light bulbs and reading energy bills to children.

Last week, Pepco turned on the power generated by the panels.

The church is expected to save 15 percent, about $450, on its monthly bill, Campbell said. More money will probably be saved after an energy audit of the church and the installation of energy-efficient doors, windows and light fixtures, he said.

The church plans to eventually install a monitor outside the sanctuary so that its members can see the amount of energy being produced and the money being saved, Trent said.

"They're excited," he said. "They can't wait to see."

The certificates are a kind of energy credit that companies such as power plants buy to sidestep government regulations and penalties for producing too much pollution.

The idea to go solar came to Trent through Gilbert Campbell III, a co-owner of Volt Energy http://volt-energy.com/, a North Carolina clean-energy company with an office in Washington. Campbell, a Howard University graduate who met Trent years earlier through his father, a pastor, had a proposition.

"I want to share with you the benefits of the church looking at solar," Campbell recalled saying in December. "You have an opportunity to educate younger students in the church," he said. "There's a value associated with that."

Volt Energy helped Florida Avenue Baptist set up a business, allowing it to make the investment and receive the certificates. The investors recouped $18,000 within 60 days from a federal tax credit that for-profit entities receive for making investments in renewable technology.

Volt Energy also customized a curriculum for the church, teaching energy efficiency, recycling, and the how-tos of using energy-efficient light bulbs and reading energy bills to children.

Last week, Pepco turned on the power generated by the panels.

The church is expected to save 15 percent, about $450, on its monthly bill, Campbell said. More money will probably be saved after an energy audit of the church and the installation of energy-efficient doors, windows and light fixtures, he said.

The church plans to eventually install a monitor outside the sanctuary so that its members can see the amount of energy being produced and the money being saved, Trent said.

"They're excited," he said. "They can't wait to see."

Subject: Post article - Congregation is first black church in D.C. to be powered by solar energy

C <<image001.jpg>> ongregation is first black church in D.C. to be powered by solar energy

By Darryl Fears, Tuesday, May, 6:52 PM

A historic black church that has sat on the same corner in LeDroit Park for 99 years has become the first African American church in the District to rely on renewable solar energy for electrical power.

Florida Avenue Baptist's http://www.flavbc.org/ installation of 44 solar panels was hailed at a ribbon-cutting Tuesday by Environmental Protection Agency Administrator Lisa P. Jackson and other government officials as a breakthrough in the black community, where the clean-energy divide mirrors its well-known high-tech digital divide with the white community.

The church's pastor, the Rev. Earl D. Trent Jr., said the panels' installation, by a North Carolina-based company in March, was important not only because the church will save money on its $3,000 monthly electric bill from Pepco but also because it will reduce "dirty" coal-fired energy and enable him to establish a "green ministry" that could awaken churchgoers who know little to nothing about clean energy and its benefits.

African Americans tend to live in older, less energy-efficient homes equipped with older appliances and, therefore, have higher energy bills.

According to "Energy Democracy <

http://www.centerforsocialinclusion.org/publications/wp-content/plugins/public ations/uploads/Energy_Democracy_Report_(WEB).pdf> ," a 2010 report by the Center for Social Inclusion, African Americans spent an average of $1,439 on electric bills in 2008, more than what Latino and Asian Americans spent, and significantly higher than what white Americans paid.

"We want to be a model for green energy," Trent said in an earlier interview. "I've gotten calls from pastors who want to find out how they can do this," he added, raising his hope that the renewable-energy divide can be bridged.

African American churches have historically led social change in black communities, raising awareness of civil rights in the past and now, possibly, environmental justice, Trent said. Helping to lower coal-energy production, even marginally, at power plants is a symbolic step in a nation where, he said, many black people live near such plants and their smokestacks.

"African Americans have more sources of pollution in their neighborhoods than others," Jackson said, standing on the roof of the church near Howard University Hospital as the sun beat down. "We have mercury, neurotoxins building up in our bodies . . . mothers pass it to children. We have . . . developmental disorders. All that comes back to this," she said, pointing to the row of solar panels.

"I think it's an extraordinary thing," said Vernice Miller-Travis, vice chair of the Maryland Commission on Environmental Justice and Sustainable Communities. "For me, this is a big story, even if it's just one church. You know how black churches are. If one pastor does it, the others have to do it because they don't want to be outdone."

When ministers inquire about getting panels, they'll learn that they'll have to spend green to go green.

At Florida Avenue Baptist, which has 500 members, the cost was $60,000. With prayer, and 12 members of the flock who were willing to invest money in exchange for Solar Renewable Energy Certificates < http://www.epa.gov/greenpower/documents/gpp_basics-recs.pdf>, the cost was overcome.

The certificates are a kind of energy credit that companies such as power plants buy to sidestep government regulations and penalties for producing too much pollution.

The idea to go solar came to Trent through Gilbert Campbell III, a co-owner of Volt Energy http://volt-energy.com/, a North Carolina clean-energy company with an office in Washington. Campbell, a Howard University

More on AFT and their Environmental program

From: Tina Flournoy, Office of the President [mailto:TFlourno@aft.org]

Sent: Wednesday, April 22, 2009 10:26 AM

To: Minyon Moore Subject: EPA Meeting

Here is why we'd like the meeting:

1 Thank EPA for its leadership on environmental issues in schools such as asbestos, indoor air quality, diesel fume exposure from school buses etc

2 PCB caulk in schools is an emerging issue that requires a coordinated national response. EPA under TSCA regulates PCB wastes but the question of appropriate protocol for testing has not been resolved. Also the question of protecting children as well as staff involved in removal needs to be resolved.

We would recommend coordinated interagency effort along with key stakeholders to shape a realistic policy. OSHA, NIOSH ASTDR and the Department of Education. We want to avoid the asbestos missteps and find a reasonable solution.

3. And we'd like to know how we can work with EPA to promote going green in schools.

Thanks and let me know if you need more or need this in a more formal way.

Hey Madam Sec,

Hope you are well. I wanted to bring to your attention that Tina Flournoy (a good sister friend whom you haven't' had a chance to meet because she is at Harvard teaching a class this semester) is Senior Counselor and Policy Director for the American Federation of Teachers in real life. She has mentioned to me that she wants to bring Randi Weingarten the new President of AFT over to meet you and discuss ways in which EPA and AFT can work together on the environment. They want to become familiar with your priorities as well as brief you on AFT's policy priorities and the work they are doing around the environment. If you are amenable can you have the appropriate person in your office reach out to (b) (6) and set up a meeting. Thanks, and I still owe you dinner.

Background

The AFT has more than 3,000 local affiliates nationwide, 43 state affiliates, and more than 1.4 million members. Five divisions within the organization represent the broad spectrum of AFT's membership: teachers; paraprofessionals and school-related personnel (PSRP); local, state and federal employees; higher education faculty and staff; and nurses and other healthcare professionals. In addition, the union includes more than 170,000 retiree members

Hey Sis.

Thanks for thinking of me. I'm doing OK. I'm in NJ with the family. Happy Vday.

On the personnel front, I'm building my EPA world very carefuly from the ground up, insisting on diversity. It is time-consuming but I feel as though I may be turning the corner. I am on course to hire people of color for at least 4 of my 10 PAS slots. Allyn has been great about filling out the communications staff with good folks that will be able to reach out to communities that EPA has not reached well before.

I did Essence and will start some big print media (Post, Times, LA Times) this week. My chief of staff saga continues. We should talk about that at some point.

(b) (6)

My staff is helping me to begin to strategically reach out to constituencies. This past week was AFL-CIO. Af American Coailition on Climate Change, Howard U, ... Next week, lots more. Congressional relationships are slower since it was all stimulus the last few weeks.

I exchanged lovely notes with after the HRC function. I'll be hooking up with each at their convenience. I am stepping up efforts to schedule a breakfast with HRC after her China trip. I haven't heard from her CoS yet but I know they are very busy working on the China trip. In the meantime

How are you? Let me know if you want to grab a drink soon.

Hillary tonight. A swearing in? Should I try to get invited or is for close friends? I'm cool either way and if she is going to be mobbed abyway, I'll look for other opportunities.
